Espionage Chief Calls for Patience

By the Associated Press

Dallas, Texas

The chief of the Central Intelligence Agency says the United States must "assume" that Russia can do in the atomic field anything that this country can do.

"The tests they've made convince us," Allen W. Dulles said here in an address before the Dallas Council on World Affairs, a privately sponsored study and lecture group.

Mr. Dulles added that in the field of atomic warfare that if you have enough it does not better your position to have ten times more than enough.

"We have ahead of us a long and difficult road," he said, adding that the time is coming when both Russia and the United States will have "enough."

That's the reason, Mr. Dulles said, why he believes all the world's problems can be settled through negotiation. As the horrors of an atomic war's possibilities grow, so must the incentive to find another way out, he said.

The country's top espionage service executive said the free world must maintain its strength in order to survive. We must prove to Moscow, he said, that "they are not going to fire us out."

Strong defenses and patience are necessary, he said.
